

The trouble with traditional labs (and what to do about it)

Natasha Holmes (Cornell University)

Most physicists would agree that experiment is fundamental to physics. Yet, most physics labs only use experiments to verify or confirm physics theory. In this talk, I'll present research that identifies some of the issues with using labs solely to verify physics concepts and present some twists on classic lab activities to teach students about the nature and joys of experimental physics.